We had just moved into a big, old house with some unused wine cellars(地窖)under the house. Because some of the areas were very old and in bad condition, my husband warned me not to walk into them alone.

One day, when I was doing cleaning, the doorbell rang. I ran to open it, but no one was there. Only a beautiful cat was sitting there, looking up at me with big, intelligent eyes. There was no way that she could have rung the doorbell by herself, was there? Were my new neighbors playing jokes on me?

We decided to welcome the new family member and my husband called her Angel. She was always by my side and she enjoyed exploring the mysterious rooms as much as I did.

My husband was away on business for a week, and I couldn't wait to do more exploration. I took a good flashlight, and carefully started down the shaky ladder.

I don't remember what happened. But I woke up with pieces of the broken ladder lying around me on the stone cellar floor. My flashlight couldn't work. My arm ached. The only light I could see was a square of daylight from the hole above. I could also see Angel looking down at me. Thank goodness, she hadn't fallen into the cellar.

There was no way I could get out of the deep cellar. I suddenly remembered that I had brought my cell phone with me. Excitedly reaching into my pocket, I pulled out a phone. Sadly, I wasn't getting any signal in this cellar.

An idea finally came to me. If I could get the phone up through the hole, it might connect to the Internet so I could shout at Siri from down below to call for help.

Angel kept her eye on me as I said to myself about my plan. I turned up the sound of the phone, then I threw the phone upward. Luckily, Angel managed to bat the phone down right by the hole, close enough for me to instruct Siri to call the police. With them on the line, I cried out my situation. I told them to look for a cat. I hope this would rescue me from danger.

Then I instructed Angel to lead the police to me. She looked back at me knowingly and walked away. Finally the police followed Angel to my side.

I no longer wonder if it was Angel herself rang the doorbell that day.

We had just moved into a big, old house with some unused wine cellars(地窖)under the house. Because some of the areas were very old and in bad condition, my husband warned me not to walk into them alone.

One day, when I was doing cleaning, the doorbell rang. I ran to open it, but no one was there. Only a beautiful cat was sitting there, looking up at me with big, intelligent eyes. There was no way that she could have rung the doorbell by herself, was there? Were my new neighbors playing jokes on me?

We decided to welcome the new family member and my husband called her Angel. She was always by my side and she enjoyed exploring the mysterious rooms as much as I did.

My husband was away on business for a week, and I couldn't wait to do more exploration. I took a good flashlight, and carefully started down the shaky ladder.

I don't remember what happened. But I woke up with pieces of the broken ladder lying around me on the stone cellar floor. My flashlight couldn't work. My arm ached. The only light I could see was a square of daylight from the hole above. I could also see Angel looking down at me. Thank goodness, she hadn't fallen into the cellar.

There was no way I could get out of the deep cellar. I suddenly remembered that I had brought my cell phone with me. Excitedly reaching into my pocket, I pulled out a phone. Sadly, I wasn't getting any signal in this cellar.

An idea finally came to me. If I could get the phone up through the hole, it might connect to the Internet so I could shout at Siri from down below to call for help.

Angel kept her eye on me as I said to myself about my plan. I turned up the sound of the phone, then I threw the phone upward. Luckily, Angel managed to bat the phone down right by the hole, close enough for me to instruct Siri to call the police. With them on the line, I cried out my situation. I told them to look for a cat. I hope this would rescue me from danger.

Then I instructed Angel to lead the police to me. She looked back at me knowingly and walked away. Finally the police followed Angel to my side.

I no longer wonder if it was Angel herself rang the doorbell that day.
